

My passion for the real estate industry can be traced back to his early days spent with my grandfather, Rex Shoaf. Together, we would tour open houses and new construction model homes, instilling in me a love for construction, architecture, and design. Even my father's profession as a general contractor would contribute to my understanding of the industry. We spent countless afternoons on job sites, observing the process of building something from the ground up and learning the value of hard work.

As fate would have it, I obtained my real estate license at the young age of 18, just a month before graduating from Carson High School in 2000. Prior to this, I had been working at a fitness center selling gym memberships, honing my skills in communication and persuasion. However, I quickly realized that my true talent lay in being a good and ethical salesperson, and I knew that real estate was the path I was meant to pursue.

Now, after 20 plus years of being a licensed real estate salesperson in the state of Nevada, I could not be happier with my choice. The industry has brought me incredible friendships and allowed me to overcome challenges that still excite me to this day. Most importantly, I've has been able to help his clients achieve financial security and build generational wealth for their families. Nothing brings me more joy then helping a seller receive a substantial profit from a sale and I love seeing the look of satisfaction on a homebuyer's face when I hand over their keys to their new home
